Excerpt: . . . incessantly employed in endeavouring to recruit his army, and to replenish his exhausted finances. The formation of twelve new regiments was announced at Paris, under the designation of volunteers, consisting of mechanics, whose shops being shut, could no longer afford them employment; and considerable supplies of troops were obtained from other quarters, though by no means in sufficient numbers, or of the best description. Since the maintenance of the French armies had fallen principally upon their own country, the public finances had sunk into the most deplorable state of embarrassment: and before the end of the month of January, the national bank encountered difficulties that approached to the confines of insolvency. From the report of the directors of this establishment, it appeared, that the available funds in their hands, at the time of making that report, amounted only to 600, 000. sterling, and that it had become indispensably necessary to restrict their daily payments to a sum not exceeding 20, 000l. At length, an army was assembled before Chalons, between the Marne and the Seine, and the French emperor prepared to suit his capital, in order to place himself at the head of his troops. Two days previous to his departure, he assembled the officers of the national guard, and in a speech delivered with a degree of emotion that seemed to indicate a presage that he was taking a final farewell, committed the empress and his infant son to their...
